

The no-call list is fine just as it is. When people have made a choice as to where they want to bank they don't need to be contacted for the next 18 months to be coaxed to change their mind. As it is, non-profit groups are a big enough bother and there should be some way to keep them from calling. We have a business at home and when the phone rings and we are expecting a customer, often there is someone calling me by my first name, pretending to be a friend and only wanting money. Please don't change the no-call list unless you manage to include the supposedly non-profit groups as well. Thank you.
